Approximately 80% of all trans fat consumed comes from artificial or “man-made” sources. Processed and snack foods like chips, cookies, crackers, vegetable shortening and commercially baked goods, as well as commercially fried foods like French fries and fried chicken may contain partially hydrogenated vegetable oil or artificial trans fat. The other roughly 20% comes from naturally occurring trans fatty acids, found in low amounts in animal products such as beef, lamb and dairy products. These fatty acids are structurally different than artificial trans fat and in terms of health effects act differently. Naturally occurring trans fatty acids do not have the same cholesterol-raising effects as man-made trans fatty acids. Thus they do not potentially increase the risk for Coronary heart Disease. As of January 1, 2006 the FDA requires food manufacturers to list amounts of trans fat with less than 0.5 gram as 0 on the Nutrition facts Panel. This list contains processed foods that have Zero Grams of Trans Fat Per Serving.
